Where an image is clearly of an individual or group of individuals, who are the focus of the image, it will be personal data, and consent is required to use it. Although the Data Protection Act does not specify that consent should be in written form it however will always obtain written consent so that we have a record, in case of subsequent disputes.

Our Consent forms will explain clearly and fully how the image will be used and how long it will be retained e.g.

Photos where individuals inadvertently appear in the background

It will not normally be necessary to obtain the specific permission of all who appear incidentally in the background of publicity shots where they are clearly not the focus of the image.

Photos of large crowds/events

Where an image does not focus on one individual or group of individuals, the data is unlikely to be personal data. In addition, it may not be practicable to obtain the consent of every individual. However, as a good practice we will ensure that there are clear signs around the venue indicating that publicity photos are being taken.

Publication on web

Publishing an image on the web is a potential disclosure to the world at large. We will take particular to obtain appropriate consent where the image constitutes personal data. In cases of doubt we will err on the side of caution and not publish the image.
